Allergenicity of foods and the hymenoptera syndrome: a review. Clinically, most allergic reactions from foods are manifested as the life-threatening hymenoptera syndrome. Characterized by the severe, systemic allergic reactions immediately following insect sting, these reactions are the most common severe forms of allergy. To prevent the hymenoptera syndrome, physicians can consider prescribing hypoallergenic food substitutes. Pharmacologic studies that assess the effects of various drugs on reactions produced by insect venom are pertinent to the hymenoptera syndrome. It is found that serum from venom immunized animals will protect the recipient from venom challenge. Furthermore, serum therapy may not require repeated administration; serum can be administered intramuscularly or subcutaneously in most situations.Expression of P2X1 receptor in sympathetic ganglion: implications for non-cholinergic control of arterial pressure. To provide a more detailed analysis of presynaptic regulation of cardiovascular function by ATP, we have examined P2 purinoceptors in normal guinea-pig Langendorff-perfused hearts and rat superior cervical ganglion. Autoradiography of the rat ganglion with [alpha-32P]ATP in the presence of suramin and P2 purinoceptor antagonists revealed labelling of P2X1 and P2Y2 receptors. Functional antagonism of ATP effects in the rat superior cervical ganglion was demonstrated with suramin but not PPADS (200 microM). In perfused hearts, ATP (1-10 microM) caused a concentration-dependent rise in perfusion pressure (measured as mean developed pressure) associated with slowing of heart rate and a fall in sympathetic nerve activity. The cardiovascular actions of ATP were antagonised by the non-specific P2 purinoceptor antagonist suramin (10 microM) or PPADS (200 microM). These data show that the heart and the rat sympathetic ganglion have functional P2Y2 and P2X1 purinoceptors, and suggest that presynaptic inhibition of the release of neurotransmitter is mediated via P2 purinoceptors. the top of the picture.
